As Gioni pointedly asks in his essay, Auriti’s desire to create a total image of the world. In his team selected an eclectic group of artists, psychologists, and anthropologists. The team not only had access to the latest technology but also the ability to tap into the collective unconscious. The project was funded by a wealthy industrialist who saw it as a way to promote his company’s image as a leader in avant-garde design. The team worked in a studio that was designed to resemble a laboratory, with walls covered in posters and diagrams. The studio was equipped with state-of-the-art equipment, including a large screen that could be used to display images from the project. The team worked long hours, often staying up late into the night. The project was a success, and the resulting images were exhibited in galleries around the world. Auriti, who was a controversial figure, was hailed as a visionary. However, some critics accused him of being more interested in fame than in the project itself. The project was eventually shut down due to financial problems, but its legacy lived on in the form of the images that were created. The images were not just artistic; they were also a reflection of the times, capturing the hopes and fears of the 20th century.
